Two Great Currents

Of emigration at present tend toward the Great Southwest; one enters the great channel at Hannibal, Mo.; the other passes through St. Louis. They meet at the Queen City of the West, Sedalia, Mo.; from thence the tide flows smoothly along, the one to sunny Southern Kansas, the other to boundless and beautiful Texas; not like the old pilgrimage across the plains, desolate and drear with starving mule and quaking wagon, but on that gleaming line of steel, the winding around the hills, passing through the forests, creeping o'er the valleys, gliding across boundless prairies, where thousands of cattle and sheep are grazing, by banks and braes, dotted and spangled with myriads of many-colored flowers, along great highways where horsemen ride merrily, rushing past giant cities with their mills, factories, churches and schools; through a country inhabited by a free and enlightened people yet to carve deep their name on a world's history. This restless tide of emigration and capital, pouring over the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway, will stop at no man's bidding, and passing years will but witness its increase.
